Accused Silence (Monologue)

By : TheFallenAngel

A young girl has found out that her father has murdered the king but on his behalf he tells that she is the one who attempted murder. Now she is running for her life in the forest with a basket and a vile that may change her destiny forever. This is a monologue she says right before she makes her decision in the forest. (She believes she is talking to her dead mother).

Published on Booksie

booksie.com/TheFallenAngel

Copyright © TheFallenAngel, 2013
Publish your writing on Booksie.com.

Accused Silence (Monologue)

Accused Silence

I want revenge on father. No one can stop me not even you. Yes, I am running away but that does not show my weakness. I shall not be hanged in front of the gullible villagers. I shall prove to them I am innocent! I doubt this will be hard. Father has accused of me of murdering our king! I canâ t do such a dishonorable thing! Plus, Father is not good at appearing with the elders when someone is against him. I should go to the elders and prove my innocence, but the elders and I donâ t have a good relationship. Looking around the forest isnâ t going to help either. I need to bring father down on his knees and begging for forgiveness. Ah, I know, I should assassinate him and destroy his remains so he will not come back a spirit, but the elders will notice a sudden uproar and point fingers. I think the best idea is for me now is to give up, he winsâ ¦. But then again one day I went to a fortune teller and she saw me drinking her potion of immortal. I cannot be immortal, that is ridiculous and absurd. But then again it will give me strength in defeating my father. Maybe, just maybe, I will try. It wonâ t hurt to try. (Takes out bottle, drinks it and drops it to the ground and smirks).

Created from Booksie.com

Generated: 2013-05-22 06:10:14