

Lookin back on childhood

By : veltzshmertz

This is something I wrote years ago and I still feel it is true. This is a somewhat joking summery of my thoughts on growing up and how people idalize their teenage years, when in fact true youth is captured in childhood.

Published on Booksie

booksie.com/veltzshmertz

Copyright © veltzshmertz, 2015
Publish your writing on Booksie.com.

Lookin back on childhood

The best years of my life

Many people live out their lives and put their teenage years on a pedestal, as the "greatest years of their lives" - I personally don't see how someone at the age of 30 can say that their 16-18 year old self was the highlight of their entire life! but then again my view on the subject is not the popular one. I look into the future and long for the past - I see my life spread ahead of me with many twists and turns but at the end of none of which do I see joyful and un-burdened playfulness quartered by an un-worried bliss. Yes, I long for youth but not that of a pimpled teenager who has problems with boys and can't do shots - I'm talking about true youth - our childhood is a once in a lifetime experience.

Childhoods differ from one to another in many minuet ways but in my personal experience it is an era unto itself, never to be repeated again. Laughter without means or end and energy that could drive an energizer out of business. Play was our job and asking tedious questions was our hobby. The world is never so truly grand as it is when seen through a child's eyes. We lived without restraints, except for the whole crossing the road thing, but who needs to see what's on the other side of the road when you can see the magic in one grain of sand. We truly valued the wonder of nature - show me a grown up who can slide down sand dunes all day long and never lose their awe and I'll show you a free spirit.

The naevness is unimaginable to us nowadays. Yes, TV's spoils much but a child's outlook is not so obscured with doses and doses of proper behavior as a grownup's is. Sometimes that might go awry - for example in a few too many doctor-patient games, but on the whole this is a time in our lives in which we express ourselves freely with little, or no, restraint.

All the wonders I have mentioned dwindle down, stifled by adulthood, I don't know exactly when. Growing up is a process which shortens daily but no matter how fast or slow we mature we can't turn back the clock. Once we're through we're through, no matter how lazy you are or how long you live in your parents house you are not a child - you already have a weight on your shoulders sporned by that tiny voice telling you what you should be doing now you've grown older. At some point we must own up to, and answer, the question that prods and pushes us to the brink of our youth: what do you want to be when you grow up?

I personally believe the question should rather be "who" and not "what", but thus or thus there comes a time when you must face the final curtain - there is no going back through the looking glass for grownups (pardon the pun).

Maybe your parents will always treat you as a baby, or they won't. Maybe you'll keep having sleepovers until your 80, and you might wet your pants from time to time - but there is no going back. One's childhood is brief and sweet - like most things in life are, if there weren't a time limit how could we appreciate what we've got?

Lookin back on childhood

Lookin back on childhood

Lookin back on childhood

Created from Booksie.com

Generated: 2015-01-29 19:39:11