By: Mistress of Word Play

I wrote this poem for those people like my sister who are nurses. They are people who rarely get the respect they deserve. What I wrote comes nowhere near what they encounter each day as they tend and heal the sick and dying.

Published on Booksie

booksie.com/Mistress of Word Play

Copyright © Mistress of Word Play, 2014 Publish your writing on Booksie.com.

She travels up and down the fluorescent lit hallways death, disease, new life, joy and sorrow as she goes. Doctors are making rounds, long hectic, monotonous days passing medications, sharing triumphs and the bitter woes.

The concrete floors along the way, always neat and clean too many things to do and too few hours are left.

She feels the pain in her back and the aching of her feet.

Those moments she has to say good-bye leave her so bereft.

A quiet moment to sort it out where she can stop and think she loves her job and tells herself, "Yes, I am content."
Call light is on she walks the distance.
Her patient wants a drink.
The time clock calls. She heads for home, proud but tired and spent.

Created from Booksie.com

Generated: 2014-07-28 02:29:18